A Big Job for a Little Dog

by Dan Jonson

Momo is a new member of Japan's police force*. She has black eyes and brown and white fur. She is 25 centimeters tall and weighs three kilograms. Momo is the world's smallest police dog.

Police dogs do all kinds of work. For example, they catch criminals, find dangerous objects and rescue people. Momo's job is to help the police find people who are missing as a result of earthquakes or other disasters. She is tiny, so she can get into places that are too small for people or bigger dogs. When she finds people, she barks, and lets the police know where the people are.

It's hard to become a police dog. Police dogs must pass different kinds of tests. The dogs have to show that they understand the policemen's instructions and can stay calm when people around them are excited. There were 70 dogs that took the tests. Only 32 passed. Momo was one of them. In fact, she did so well on the tests that she got her favorite dinner of chicken and tomatoes as a prize.

Mr. Otsuka, a Japanese police officer, said, "We are very proud of Momo. She has a big job for a little dog."

Today, Beth has a very busy life. "I am married and have a wonderful son. I still enjoy playing tennis, but now it's just for fun," says Beth. She also enjoys other sports such as kayaking. Beth even finds time to teach people in wheelchairs how to play tennis. She also helps organize sports competitions at her son's school.

Beth's story is so special that she was asked to appear in a film called Champions on Wheels. This movie is about people who work very hard to succeed after an accident. Beth is an excellent example of this. She gives people hope, and helps them believe that anything is possible.
